WSP USA FIELD SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

Flash Flood Threat

Florida

- Millions of people along much of Florida's Atlantic Coast will face a weeklong flash flood threat that NOAA's Weather Prediction Center (WPC) said has similar atmospheric conditions to the event that produced historic flooding in parts of Brevard County earlier this month.
- The WPC has issued a Level 2 out of 4 flash flood risk from Jacksonville to Miami Tuesday, with rain already arriving over parts of North Florida early Tuesday morning.
- The FOX Forecast Center is tracking a weather disturbance that brought severe weather to Texas and Louisiana, which will move across the Gulf but will get trapped over Florida for much of the week as easterly winds continuously funnel moisture over the region. That moisture will fuel periods of repeated downpours throughout the week.
- Onshore winds are also expected to produce days of rough waves and dangerous rip currents.
- A high rip current risk is in effect for Melbourne, Stuart, Daytona Beach, Titusville, Fort Pierce and Vero Beach through Wednesday.
- The highest rain and storm chances are focused along Florida's east coast, with the potential for widespread rain of 4 to 6 inches throughout this week, with localized amounts surpassing 8 inches, according to the National Weather Service.
