Nor'easter

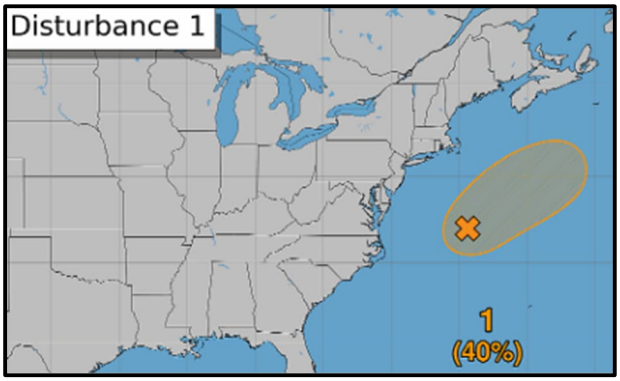

Carolinas/Mid-Atlantic

- An October nor'easter is still hugging the Atlantic coast, where it will bring high surf, rip currents, coastal flooding and winds to parts of the East Coast for several more days.
- The National Hurricane Center is continuing to monitor this area for possible subtropical development. If it gets a name, it will be Josephine.
- Coastal flood alerts are in effect for parts of coastal North Carolina, where anywhere from 1 to 4 feet of inundation is possible. High surf advisories are also in place across the North Carolina coastline, with waves potentially reaching up to 14 feet.
- A mandatory evacuation remains in effect for visitors on Hatteras Island as storm conditions are expected to worsen, with the potential for significant ocean overwash.
- Across parts of the coastlines of Virginia, Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey, inundation up to a foot and large waves to 10 feet are possible.
- Water levels across river gauges from North Carolina to Maryland could rise to moderate flood stage by Thursday.
- The Outer Banks will again see the worst impacts in terms of winds and rain. Wind advisories are in place, calling for winds to gust up to 40 mph. These winds could knock out power lines and bring travel delays.
- The low is expected to stay well offshore and just slowly meander to the northeast over the next few days.
- By Thursday, the low should be off the Massachusetts coast, which will bring strong winds and rough coastal conditions for the Cape later this week.

Tropical Activity – Atlantic
